Ubiquiti NanoStation loco M2 question

2019/08/11

So I want to use a pair of these nanostations to setup a remote camera and view the camera's feed with an android device. The basic idea of this is I want...[wireless IP camera] [loco M2] [loco M2] [Android device]If I need more hardware than this please let me know, I haven't messed with these yet so I'm in unknown territory. Because this is a remote setup I will not have access to power, I need to run everything off battery, but I only need to run it for a few hours. I think I can accomplish this by using a 20,000 mah phone/tablet charger style battery pack. I know I can get a camera that will run off the 5v from the battery pack, however the nanostations are using a 110vac to 24vdc, 0.5a PoE injector for power. Since I have no access to 110vac I want to supply the nanostation using a dc to dc booster converter to take the 5v, 2.4a from the USB plug on the battery pack and convert it to the 24v, 0.5a. I was thinking this should be as simple as taking a USB cable, splicing it to the input side of the booster and then taking the cat cable and splicing it to the output side of the booster. However, I am unfamiliar with PoE devices and I'm not sure if by excluding a "off the shelf" PoE injector am I getting rid of any functionality that I will need? I've also looked but cannot seem to find a PoE injector that is setup to work in those 2 voltages except the Ubiquiti AIRGATEWAY PRO INSTALLER but this PoE injector seems to be quite a bit more expensive than needed if I can simply use the dc to dc converter.
